The document concludes with figures, tables, and an extensive bibliography.

LL Fitness Fun John Krogh, 2004. The book begins by explaining the goals of the exercise program for children: 1. to have fun while exercising with their parents, and 2. to develop early exercise habits. For parents, the goals are to assist them in developing a strong intimate relationship with their children while participating in a good exercise program for themselves. There are chapters for the single-parent family and for the two-parent family. The exercises are varied according to the sizes of the children and the strength and fitness of the parents. Each exercise has variations ranging from very easy to very vigorous, with explanations on how to progress from one level to the next higher level. A parent can use these exercises to simply have fun with their children. On the other hand, parents can get a heavy-duty sweaty workout for themselves if that is what they want. In fact, a parent using this method doesn't need to leave the family at home and run off to the gym or to the jogging trail to get a workout. Each exercise that is used consists of chairs, a bed, pillows, a blanket, a carpeted floor, plus a board, a piece of rope, and a bar or piece of pipe.
