

BIODIVERSITY OF FISHES IN CANADA'S NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

Brian W. COAD*

Canadian Museum of Nature, Ottawa, Ontario, Canada

Coad B.W. 2011. Biodiversity of fishes in Canada's National Capital Region. Acta Ichthyol. Piscat. 41 (2): 89–94.

Background. Fishes are important both economically and as indicators of environmental health. Questions on the health of aquatic habitats, on the potential effects of planned and accidental changes to the environment, and on the utility of adding sport and other fishes to a water body are best answered by an analysis which is known to be sensitive to changes.

Materials and methods. As an initial test study I examined 107 fish species in and around the National Capital Region of Canada (50 km radius of the Peace Tower at the Parliament Buildings) in terms of 56 parameters. The parameters include life history characteristics such as size, lifespan, breeding season, egg numbers, and feeding, as well as zoogeographic origin, distribution, and risk status. Non-parametric tests and a logistic regression were used to analyze the data.

Results. A test case comparison of sport versus non-sport fishes confirmed the empirical observation that sport fishes are predominately large piscivores. Critical parameters for threatened versus non-threatened species included piscivory and egg production, for percent versus absent species feeding habits and refugial origin, and for refugial origin parameters associated with spawning.

Conclusion. The parameter database can be of potential use to determine which species are at risk and which parameters are critical, why certain species are absent, and what parameters characterize sport fishes. The analysis forms a preliminary basis for more detailed field studies which can then be directed to specific life history traits and environmental variables.

INTRODUCTION

The National Capital Region (NCR) of Canada is an area with a radius of 50 km centred on the Peace Tower of the Parliament Buildings. This circular region has been surveyed for various taxa including fishes (McAllister and Coad 1975). The NCR straddles the Ottawa River and includes a diverse array of habitats from protected waters in Gatineau Park to farmland and heavily urbanised sections. Population growth and development will inevitably constrain the diversity of fishes found in the NCR. Invasion of exotic species, such as zebra mussels, are also a potential threat to the health of fish populations and to the biodiversity. Many species are at the northern limits of their range in this part of Canada and survival of populations for some species is delicately poised with risk intimately associated with life history traits.

The purpose of this study is to use known life history traits and distributional data to explore reasons for the composition of the ichthyofauna. For example, threatened species are compared with those which are well established and these two groups should exhibit different life history traits. Threatened species are often characterised as large and long-lived or K-selected. Such species often have a low fecundity, extended age to maturity, and slow growth, rendering them susceptible to man-made change such as habitat destruction, eutrophication, and competition with exotics (Parent and Schriml 1995). Large size attracts interest as food or sport fishes, often leading to overfishing and subsequent stock declines. A migratory phase in the life cycle is suspected to be a critical factor since dams, bridges and roads, farming, pollution, and urbanisation may affect these species by reducing available reproductive habitat or access to it. Threatened species may have other life history traits which constrain them such as a preference for colder water, a declining asset when forest is cleared and urban wastes raise temperature levels. Similarly, specialised feeders such as predators at the top of the food chain are likely to be more at risk than omnivores. Successful species, on the other hand, are more likely to be small, short-lived and r-selected, able to adapt or recover from man-made changes through annual production of many young. Nest-builders and species showing parental care may also be more successful in bringing more young through earlier stages of development.

The National Capital Region was covered by an ice sheet 12 000 years BP and has been recolonised since
