Khartoum The account presented here looks at the brighter side of Gordon's life in the Sudan his feelings his numerous comments portrayed in his journals and his concern for others It also outlines his ingenuity as a member of the royal engineers used to defend Khartoum together with the final outcome before and after his death as seen by the romantic and critic Finally an assessment is made of his impact on society at the time and what remains of his memory today Charles Gordon had faith in what he was doing during his life In the end he had faith that an army would come to save Khartoum but it arrived too late a few days after Even then he put his faith in his God and became a hero and a martyr and an example for everyone
