Egyptian Cosmology Rachel Bakers, In the beginning according to ancient Egyptian understanding there was only Nun the vast dark primordial waters that existed before creation itself This was not merely empty space or void but rather a pregnant darkness filled with infinite potential The Egyptians conceived of Nun as both the source and the ultimate destination of all existence a cosmic ocean that surrounded and permeated everything that would come to be Unlike the creation myths of other ancient civilizations that often begin with conflict or divine struggle the Egyptian cosmogony starts with this peaceful undifferentiated unity From these primordial waters emerged the first conscious being Atum whose name means the complete one or the one who completes himself Atum represented the principle of self creation the divine spark that could generate existence from nothingness through sheer force of will and consciousness The Egyptians understood this emergence not as a violent rupture but as a natural unfolding like a lotus flower blooming from the depths of a sacred pond Atum was simultaneously the creator and the first created embodying the paradox of divine self generation that would become central to Egyptian theological thinking The act of creation itself was envisioned as both physical and metaphysical According to the Heliopolitan creation myth one of the most influential cosmogonic traditions Atum created the first divine pair through masturbation or in some versions through sneezing or spitting This seemingly crude imagery actually encoded profound philosophical concepts about the nature of creative force and the relationship between thought word and manifestation The first divine couple Shu air dryness and Tefnut moisture humidity represented the fundamental dualities that would structure all of existence
