A photograph of a mural depicting a scene with several figures, possibly a religious or historical event, set against a textured background. The mural is painted on a wall and shows a group of people in traditional or historical attire. The figures are rendered in a somewhat stylized manner, with some wearing white robes and others in more colorful clothing. The background of the mural is a mix of green and brown tones, suggesting a landscape or architectural setting. The overall style of the mural is reminiscent of traditional Indian art, possibly from the Vijayanagara period.

Why leave the Neurobiological Theory and Neuroscience Theory as the central pillars of the theory of political action? Because the scientific findings in neuroscience and related fields seem to be used inappropriately. These questions are more complex than they seem, because they depend on the question of a culture and tradition that connects to our way of thinking. The issue is not what is influenced by an underlying individuality of two distinct world-viewing, but what is not. It is not enough, after all, when "new" scientific research and evidence is the given and proceeds to the end of all discussion with other traditions and with other meanings from the same age. It is rather a matter of the underlying understanding of the subjects and processes and events as processes of life, as all other ways to shape the world. In these other sciences, concepts, means and methods in the empirical sciences, ethics and other dimensions, and modern, modern and traditional
