

THE SUMMER MAN

In this, his first full-length novel, Ray Bradbury turns away from stars and planets and enters the real world, coming to earth in Green Town, Illinois, in the early summer of 1928. He writes in the person of a twelve-year-old boy who, on the first morning of that flawless summer, discovered the fact that he was really alive. In front of him stretched three months of unguessable wonders: in the busy small town, he would watch and listen. What could he expect to see and hear?

Certainly not the procession of strange and vivid people who happened to come his way during those enchanted days: the inventor who almost took the pleasure out of life by building a Happiness Machine; the young reporter who fell in love with a charming lady of ninety; the old gentleman whose last act was listening to the clang of a green trolley car going round a corner, two thousand miles away; aunts, colonels, great-grandmothers, junkmen, witches.

But when hints of autumn eventually broke into that lovely summer, when buses took the place of trolleys in the town, when his best friend moved away, he had also learned that death had a meaning, and his childhood innocence had reached its last breath. And Ray Bradbury has written a beautiful book, full of summer, and enriched by the original imagination that made The Illustrated Man and Fahrenheit 451 such popular and widely praised books.
