

STAFFING OUR SCHOOLS: EXPEDIENT OR PLAN

DOUGLAS WEIR

SYNOPSIS

There has recently been considerable media attention over the difficulty of attracting applicants to enter the teaching profession. While that difficulty affects England more than Scotland at present, there are indicators of a similar problem looming in Scotland. That difficulty is however only part of the problem of teaching standards in schools. Of equal concern is the lack of a requirement that teachers who take on new roles or new subjects have their competence to do so formally accredited. A new consultation paper from the Scottish Office about the continuing professional development of teachers may help tackle some of these concerns over standards, but a more comprehensive review of the recruitment, training, and employment of teachers would be preferable.

PRESENT OUTPUTS

In June 1998 around two thousand intending teachers left the six teacher education institutions in Scotland. These people from primary four-year degree and postgraduate one-year certificate programmes and their equivalent secondary programmes looked forward to immediate uncertainty over employment. That uncertainty, however, requires to be examined from a number of perspectives.

In employment terms, the uncertainty derived from a continuing squeeze on the funding of local authorities. Despite being elected in May 1998 on a manifesto which proclaimed a commitment to 'education, education, education', the Labour government was also committed to maintaining the previous Conservative government's tight public sector expenditures. While some public sector budgets had been re-arranged to ensure more money for education and health within the overall cap on the public sector, much of that 'new' money was given to high profile aspects such as Information Technology and new buildings. Little, if anything, had been allocated to the biggest item in the education budget, the numbers and salaries of teachers.

In job security terms, the uncertainty derived from a fashionable tendency among public and private sector employers to casualise the workforce. As a means of coping with uncertain budgets, employers make greater use of part-time and temporary staff. This is of particular relevance to education authorities who see low birth rates and small school rolls, together with a freeze on early retirement for their older teachers, as posing high risks if they recruit new teachers on full-time, permanent contracts.

In labour mobility terms, the uncertainty was based on an unwillingness or inability to relocate elsewhere in the United Kingdom. This at a time when the national press was in panic over the large number of vacancies for teachers.

The Times Educational Supplement carries 77 pages of job advertisements this weekend, which is well down on its record 323 pages at Easter. But it is a sure sign of the yawning demand of schools for teachers that threatens to wreck the government's strategy for improving educational standards. (Sunday Times, 31 May 1998, p. 4).

The estimate of 20,000 vacancies for teachers in England sat uncomfortably with a Scottish Office estimate provided for the Minister of Education's short term working group on initial teacher education that over 4,000 of the recent (last seven years)
