

INTRODUCED

- The first cell probably came into being when a membrane formed, enclosing a small volume of aqueous solution and separating it from the rest of the universe
- Membranes define the external boundaries of cells and control the molecular traffic across that boundary; in eukaryotic cells, they also divide the internal space into discrete compartments to segregate processes and components
- Proteins embedded in and associated with membranes organize complex reaction sequences and are central to both biological energy conservation and cell-to-cell communication
