

3 PERIOPERATIVE CONSIDERATIONS FOR ANESTHESIA

Steven M. Hackman, MD,CM, PhD, FRCP(C), Richard M. Hoady, MD,CM, Alain Deschamps, MD, PhD, Anne Moore, MD, and Thomas Schertler, MD, PhD

Advancements in modern surgical care are complemented by alterations in anesthetic management to provide maximum patient benefit. During the last two decades, anesthesia practice has changed considerably—with the proliferation of airway devices, the routine employment of patient-controlled analgesia, the wider popularity of regional anesthesia, including thoracic epidural anesthesia and peripheral nerve blocks, the development of computer-controlled devices for infusing anesthetic drugs, the discovery and use of quickly reversible intubational drugs, opioids, and muscle relaxants, the availability of online monitoring of central nervous system (CNS) function, and the increased application of transesophageal echocardiography, to name but a few examples. Our aim in this chapter is to offer surgeons a current perspective on perioperative considerations for anesthesia to facilitate dialogue between the surgeon and the anesthesiologist and thereby ensure optimum care for our patients. The primary focus is on the adult patient; the special issues concerning pediatric anesthesia are beyond the scope of our review. In addition, the ensuing discussion is necessarily selective; more comprehensive discussions may be found elsewhere.<sup>1,2</sup>

Perioperative Patient Management

Preoperative medical evaluation is an essential component of preoperative assessment for anesthesia. Of particular importance to the anesthesiologist is any history of personal or family problems with anesthesia. Information should be sought concerning difficulty with airway management or intubation, drug allergy, delayed awakening, significant preoperative nausea and vomiting (PONV), unreported history of intra-aortic catheter (IOAC) placement, and prior dental problems (bad teeth). Previous anesthetic records may be requested.

The airway must be carefully examined to identify patients at risk for difficult ventilation or intubation [see Special Anesthesia, Difficult Airway, below], with particular attention paid to teeth, eyes, ears, nose, throat, and bridges. Patients must be informed about the risk of trauma associated with intubation and airway management. Apnea/bradycardia [see Choice of Anesthesia, below] should be discussed, including the likelihood of postoperative ventilation and admission to the hospital or ICU. When relevant, the possibility of blood product administration should be raised [see 1.4 Bleeding and Transfusion], and the patient's acceptance or refusal of transfusion should be carefully documented. Postoperative pain management [see 1.4 Postoperative Pain] should be addressed, particularly when a major procedure is planned. The risks associated with general or regional anesthesia (see below) should be discussed in an informative and reassuring manner; a well-conducted preoperative anesthesia interview plays an important role in alleviating anxiety.

The medications the patient is taking can have a substantial impact on anesthetic management. Generally, patients should continue to take their regular medications up to the time of the operation. It is especially important not to abruptly discontinue medications that may result in withdrawal or rebound phenomena (e.g., beta blockers, alpha antagonists, tricyclics, and opioids). With some medications (e.g., oral hypoglycemics, insulin, and corticosteroids), perioperative dosage adjustments may be necessary [see 1.10 Endocrine Problems]. Arginine-vasopressin (AVP) inhibitors have been associated with intraoperative hypotension and may be withheld at the discretion of the anesthesiologist.<sup>3</sup> Drugs that should be discontinued preoperatively include monoamine oxidase inhibitors (MAOIs) and oral anticoagulants [see Table 1].

Many surgical patients are taking antiplatelet drugs. Careful consideration should be given to the withdrawal of these agents in the perioperative period [see Table 1] because of the possibility that discontinuation may lead to an acute coronary syndrome. Patients with recently placed coronary artery drug-eluting stents (< 1 year) may be at particular risk, so elective surgery should be postponed.<sup>4</sup> If surgery is necessary, and patients are deemed to be at increased risk for medication-related bleeding during surgery, the longer-acting agents (e.g., aspirin, clopidogrel, and ticagrelor) can be replaced with nonmedicated nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs (NSAIDs) that have shorter half-lives. Typically, these shorter-acting drugs are given for 30 days, stopped on the day of surgery, and then restarted 4 hours after operation. Patient transfusion can be considered if there is a very high potential for significant bleeding.<sup>5</sup>

The increasing use of herbal and alternative medicines has led to significant morbidity and mortality as a consequence of unreported interactions with traditional drugs. Because many patients fail to mention such agents as part of their medication regimen during the preoperative assessment, it is advisable to question all patients directly about their use. Particular attention should be given to Chinese herbal teas, which include organic compounds and toxic constituents that may produce renal failure or failure, cholestasis, hepatitis, and thrombocytopenia. Specific recommendations exist for the discontinuation of many of these agents [see Table 1].

Prophylactic administration of perioperative beta blockers in patients with or at risk for atherosclerotic disease undergoing noncardiac surgery is controversial and institution specific.
