

LOOSE ENDS OF THEORY ON THE INDIVIDUAL, PATTERN, AND INVOLUTION IN PRIMITIVE SOCIETY

BY ALEXANDER A. GOLDENWEISER

THE PRIMITIVE INDIVIDUAL

ANTHROPOLOGISTS are no longer surprised when new evidence is brought forth of the existence of full-fledged individuality among primitives. In the heyday of folk theory it was glibly assumed that the primitive individual was literally submerged, that no room was left for personality or self-expression in a society ridden by tradition, dominated by established habits and dogmas, shot through with inflexible patterns. No one any longer believes this. We know now that the very uniformity of primitive patterns should not be taken literally. After all, variation is not completely spirited away; in art, craft, storytelling, dancing, social behavior, there is difference between performance and performance, difference in skill, in details of form, in facility of execution. So also in religion, as Radin and others have pointed out, some lead, others follow, some originate, others imitate, some throw themselves body and soul into supernatural participation, others offer little more than lip service to the divine. Again, the prevalence of hard and fast matrimonial regulations does not preclude occasional divagations, including elopements with a "wrong" mate, or even, in some few instances, suicides over romantic frustrations.

We learn from Malinowski that the Melanesian standards of beauty differ materially from our own, but also that, within these culturally conditioned limits, individual taste will have its sway. So also with crime; it may remain true that among primitives practice agrees with legal or customary regulation a little more closely than it does with us, but this does not preclude breaches of customs and taboos, secular or sacred. In brief, cultural uniformity as a feature of primitiveness must be accepted in a relative, not an absolute, sense.

Still, it must be granted that the range of individual variation, in all matters cultural, is relatively narrow among primitives. The question remains: In how far does this fact have psychological significance? Does the primitive chafe under customary limitations? Does he feel himself a mere cog in the wheels of society? Does he recognize himself as one unit in a set of similar or identical units? Of all this there is no evidence whatsoever. Rather is the contrary true. Anthropological field records agree in representing primitives as leading a lusty, animated, exciting existence. At first blush this psychological picture contrasts strangely with the recognized objective uniformity of folk culture. Upon reflection, the contrast should not impress one as strange or contradictory.
