

What Technologies Are Necessary for a Clean Energy Transition?

An array of technologies – both those already in use and those needing to be developed – are needed for an economy-wide shift to cleaner energy. First, utilities will need to have six technological functions in place. Then, these functions can support energy technologies related to four key areas for energy transition.

Utilities can support adoption and implementation of these technologies through:

Program development – encouraging customer participation in cost and energy-saving projects.

Technology planning – combining new tech with other capital expenditures.

Tech transfer – sharing lessons and tools to replicate success.

Energy purchasing – seeking lower emission sources from suppliers.

Pilot projects – testing rollout of related programs and services.

Funding – leveraging local, state, and federal grants to reduce costs.
