

#2. [Defining Resistance] A resistor can be modeled as just a piece of material with an intrinsic property, called resistivity ρ , that prevents mobile charges from accelerating indefinitely. In this problem, we will apply some voltage V across a resistor with cross-sectional area A and length L and see how it responds. Ultimately, we want to know the total resistance.

- (a) What is the applied voltage, V , in terms of the electric field E in the material and any relevant mathematical constants or properties of the resistor?
- (b) What is the current, I , that runs through the resistor in terms of the electric field E in the material and any relevant mathematical constants or properties of the resistor?
- (c) Use Ohm's law ($V = IR$) to determine the total resistance R of this resistor in terms of the properties of the resistor and any needed mathematical constants. Check the units of your calculation (resistivity ρ has units of $\Omega \cdot \text{m}$).
Tip: Resistance should be a property of the resistor and thus NOT depend on the electric field!
