

Darren J.N. Middleton and Peter Bien, eds., God's struggler. Religion in the writings of Nikos Kazantzakis. Macon, Georgia: Mercer University Press, 1996. Pp. xii, 236.

Grandiloquent and scornful of those less intellectually adventurous than he, Kazantzakis has been a figure of controversy from almost the beginning of his career. He has been called an atheist, a religious thinker, a heretic, a Buddhist, and a communist among other names. In a country such as Greece, in which nationalism and religion are tightly bound up with each other, his attempts to synthesise a new mythology for the modern age was seen tantamount to treason. He seems to have succeeded in his 1908 goal — to formulate his individual and personal conception of life and write about it — yet he seems to have kept tinkering with the formulation throughout his career. During his lifetime his work rarely received an unbiased review, either from his outraged critics or even his supporters — who took his grandiose aspirations at face value. While many Greek writers have tended to focus on whether Kazantzakis could be called Orthodox or even a Christian, the essays here seek to move beyond such narrow concerns. In this new volume, Darren Middleton and Peter Bien have gathered together eleven contributions (one a reprint) to situate Kazantzakis in the wider context of religious thought. As they write in the introduction, 'Although our purpose is surely not to convert Kazantzakis to Christianity, we do hope to counteract his opponents' assertion that his attempt to make sense of divine and human becoming is unworthy of a place in the history of Christian thought'(17). They have done so admirably.

All the contributors have engaged with Kazantzakis thoroughly, acknowledging his flaws as well as his strengths. Particularly welcome are the attempts by Bien, Demetrios Constantelos, Daniel Dombrowski, and Joseph Jeter to discern some coherence in Kazantzakis' vacillations of belief. In providing something of a key to the theology that forms the basis of Kazantzakis' work, this volume is especially useful to his readers who have more of a grounding in literature than in theology or philosophy.

One of the valuable aspects in bringing together thinkers from so many backgrounds is that it suggests new comparisons and perspectives: Kazantzakis' thought finds itself juxtaposed with that of such diverse thinkers as Chaim Potok, Jung, Kierkegaard, Luther, and the process philosopher Alfred North Whitehead. It also provides fundamental information for Kazantzakis studies, particularly in Michael Antonakes' valuable overview of the controversy surrounding the man and his work. Then there is Constantelos who, in his evaluation of Kazantzakis' religious thought, dispassionately delves into the (mostly Greek) controversy surrounding the orthodoxy of Kazantzakis' Orthodoxy: he suggests convincingly that the Cretan is Orthodox in his spiritual/mystical religiosity, his terminology, and his ideas about the reciprocity existing between man and God, but heterodox in his dogma.

Middleton uses the tools of process while acknowledging the 'seemingly insurmountable differences' between Whitehead and Kazantzakis, believes that 'Whiteheadian process theologians would do well to reflect on how Kazantzakis poeticises divine and creaturely struggle within our world of evolutionary striving'
