of functions, some of which are concerned with safing, arming, and firing, spurious actuation of EEDs and/or changes in the performance characteristics of electronic circuits could result in serious degradation of safety and reliability. Depending on the degree of degradation, these undesired actions can range from injury to personnel or damage to material to degradation of fuse performance beyond acceptable tolerances. Because of the potential seriousness of the problem, some specifications concerned with EME carry the statement that EEDs shall not be used when the functional requirement can be met by other equally cost-effective means.

The Electromagnetic Evaluation Section of the ARDEC has a technical staff and facilities available to help fuse designers meet the EME requirements (Ref. 9). The recommended approach is to employ an EME specialist early in development to address the EME requirements and thereby avoid expensive and less-than-optimum retrofit protection that may be needed when it is found that the design does not meet the EME requirements. Ref. 9 also suggests that the EME specialist be called on to participate in developing requirements documents, test plan reviews, tests, and the various review stages of the development.

The seven EMEs discussed in Ref. 9 should be considered during development of each fuse. They are radio frequencies (RF) susceptibility, lightning susceptibility, electrostatic discharge, electromagnetic pulse (EMP), electromagnetic interference/electromagnetic compatibility (EMI/EMC), electronic countermeasures/electronic counter-countermeasures (ECM/ECOM), and electromagnetic fields inadvertently emanating from operating equipment (TEMPEST). The degree of attention each of these effects receives from the developer is normally determined by the criteria delineated in the requirement document for the item. The developer should be aware, however, that protection from EME can frequently be designed into the system at little or no cost by careful choice of components and configuration. The potential EME susceptibility of a fuse will increase as wires are attached or the fuse is mounted on a munition because these actions increase the receiving effectiveness of the fuse antenna; susceptibility evaluation tests should consider this phenomenon.

14-2.1.6.1 RF Susceptibility

Principal sources of RF energy are radars and communications equipment. To exacerbate the problem, the trend for this equipment is to generate even higher radiated power in the future. Information for Army applications on the maximum field intensities of concern and guidance for developing tests are provided in Ref. 10. Ref. 11 is a Navy handbook that provides electromagnetic environment considerations for the protection of military electronics from the adverse effects of the electromagnetic radiation environment. RF hazard tests are performed to evaluate the susceptibility to premature detonation of firing circuits containing EEDs during the various logistic and deployment phases of the fuse. The Army RF hazard field intensity certification levels, "TAG criteria", are presented in Table 14-3.

Both reliability and safety of EEDs are of concern. The accepted Army safety factor for hazardous conditions is 10 dB and for reliability it is 6 dB.

Ref. 9 cites the following paragraph as an example of how the safety factor is applied:

"Consider an EED that has a no-fire current of 200 milliamperes. No-fire current is defined as that level of current that will not fire this EED 99.99% of the time, with a 90% confidence level. For example, if premature detonation of this EED would cause a safety hazard, applying the 10 dB safety factor defines a current ratio of 3.13. This means 200/3.13 or 63.90 milliamperes is the maximum safe current that may be induced in the EED when subjected to any of the field intensities shown...." (Applicable data are shown in Table 14-3.)

If the fuse is to be used in Navy applications, the requirements of MIL-STD-1385 (Ref. 12) must be met. Similarly, if the fuse is to be used in Air Force applications, the requirements of MIL-STD-1512 (Ref. 13) must be met.

14-2.1.6.2 Lightning Susceptibility

As part of their life exposure, fuses may be subjected to lightning. MIL-STD-1757 (Ref. 14) presents test techniques for this environment. Fuses are normally subjected to pulses of current having peak amplitudes of 200 kA and time durations of less than 500  $\mu$ s. Assessment criteria are that the fuse should not create a safety hazard after undergoing a Handbook of Substance Misuse and Addictions Vinood B. Patel, Victor R. Preedy, 2022-10-17. Substance misuse and addictions are a public health issue. They affect the well being of each community and nation as a whole. It is therefore necessary to identify, educate and treat individuals who are addicted to substances. Policies and procedures go hand in hand with public health education and safety. The science behind the public health issues of one drug may be applicable to other drugs as well. However, marshalling all of the aforementioned information into a single source is somewhat difficult due to the wide array of material. The Editors address this by compiling the research in this single reference work that serves as a one stop shopping approach to everything readers need to know about the scientific basis of public health and addictions and agents of misuse. Apart from active agents that have a plant or chemical basis, there is a need to consider that there are other forms of addiction which may have common modes of causality or prevention. These include food addiction, gaming, gambling and other non drug addictions. These types of addiction may be related to the addiction of drugs. The Handbook of Substance Misuse and Addictions: From Biology to Public Health offers a holistic understanding of the relationship between public health and substance misuse. The text provides a common platform upon which other forms of addiction or substance misuse can be understood and treated. Addiction processes involve understanding the biological processes as well as behavior, psychology, sociology and public health, all of which are interlinked. This Handbook is a useful reference for lecturers, students, researchers, practitioners and other professionals in public health, addiction science, epidemiology, health education, health promotion and health sciences.
