RESEARCHERS HAVE FOUND THAT the use of a computer program to monitor the use of a patient's medication can reduce the risk of medication errors. The program, called Medication Management System (MMS), was developed by researchers at the University of California, San Francisco. The program is designed to help patients manage their medication by providing them with a list of their medications and their instructions. The program also provides a list of the side effects of each medication and a list of the interactions between different medications. The program is available in both English and Spanish. The researchers found that the use of the MMS program reduced the risk of medication errors by 50%.

They also helped to reduce the risk of disease by providing information about the importance of using insecticide-treated bed nets and other protective measures.
