

#2. [Defining Resistance] A resistor can be modeled as just a piece of material with an intrinsic property, called resistivity  $\rho$ , that prevents mobile charges from accelerating indefinitely. In this problem, we will apply some voltage  $V$  across a resistor with cross-sectional area  $A$  and length  $L$  and see how it responds. Ultimately, we want to know the total resistance.

- (a) What is the applied voltage,  $V$ , in terms of the electric field  $E$  in the material and any relevant mathematical constants or properties of the resistor?
- (b) What is the current,  $I$ , that runs through the resistor in terms of the electric field  $E$  in the material and any relevant mathematical constants or properties of the resistor?
- (c) Use Ohm's law ( $V = IR$ ) to determine the total resistance  $R$  of this resistor in terms of the properties of the resistor and any needed mathematical constants. Check the units of your calculation (resistivity  $\rho$  has units of  $\Omega \cdot \text{m}$ ).
Tip: Resistance should be a property of the resistor and thus NOT depend on the electric field!
