Sielanka: An Idyll and In Vain Henryk Sienkiewicz, 2020-09-28 In the woods in the deep woods was an open glade in which stood the house of the forester Stephan The house was built of logs packed with moss and the roof was thatched with straw hard by the house stood two outbuildings in front of it was a piece of fenced in ground and an old well with a long crooked sweep the water in the well was covered with a green vegetation at the edges Opposite the windows grew sunflowers and wild hollyhocks high stately and covered with blossoms as if with a swarm of gorgeous butterflies between the sunflowers there peeped the red heads of the poppy around the hollyhocks entwined sweet peas with pink blossoms and morning glories close to the ground grew nasturtiums marigolds primroses and asters pale because they were shaded from the sunlight by the leaves of the hollyhocks and sunflowers The fenced ground on either side of the pathway leading to the house was planted with vegetables carrots beets and cabbage further off in a separate fenced in lot there waved with each breath of wind the tender blue flower of the flax still beyond could be seen the dark green of the potato patch the rest of the clearing was checkered with the variegated shades of the different cereals that ran to the edge of the lake which touched the glade on one side Near to the house a few trees were growing Some were cherry trees and one was a birch with long slender branches which swayed in the wind and with every breeze its leaves touched the dilapidated moss covered straw thatch of the roof when the stronger gusts of wind bent its boughs to the wall and pressed its twigs and the waves of leaves against the roof it would seem as if the tree loved the house and embraced it In this tree the sparrows made their home the rustling of the leaves and twigs commingled with the chirp and joyous noise of the birds in the eaves of the house the doves had built their nests and the place was filled with their speech cooing and calling to each other entreating and discussing as is customary between doves these noisy and talkative people At times it happened that they were startled by some unknown cause then around the house was heard a loud flapping the air was filled with the whirl of wings and a multitude of white feathered breasts you could hear tumult noise and excited cries the whole flock flew out suddenly circled round the house now near now far off Sometimes they melted in the blue sometimes their white feathers reflected the sunlight again they hung over the house undulating in the air and alighting at last like a downfall of snowflakes on the gray straw of the roof If this occurred in the rosy morning or in the splendor of the red setting sun then in the glory of the air these doves were not white but tinted pink and settled on the roof and birch tree as flames or scattered rose leaves At twilight when the sun had hidden itself beyond the woods this cooing under the roof and chirping in the birch tree became gradually quiet The sparrows and the doves shook the dew from their wings and prepared to sleep sometimes one of them gave voice once more but more rarely more softly more drowsily and then all was silent the dusk was falling from the heavens upon the earth The house cherry trees and birch were losing their form mingling together melting and veiled in a mist which rose from the lake Around the glade as far as the eye could reach there stretched the wall of dark pine trees and thick undergrowth This wall was broken in one place by a wide dividing line which reached to the edge of the lake The lake was a very large one the opposite side was nearly lost to view and in the mist could be hardly discerned the red roof and steeple of a church and the black line of the woods closing the horizon beyond the church
