They were also more stable in solution. However, they were still not as effective as the original penicillin. In the 1960s, a new class of penicillins was developed. These were called "penicillinase-resistant penicillins" and they were designed to be more effective against bacteria that produce the enzyme penicillinase. This enzyme breaks down penicillin, making it ineffective. The new penicillins were designed to be resistant to this enzyme. They were also more stable in solution and easier to administer. These penicillins were a major breakthrough in the treatment of bacterial infections. They were also more effective against a wider range of bacteria than the original penicillin. This was a significant improvement in the treatment of bacterial infections. The new penicillins were also more stable in solution and easier to administer.
