Interfaces José Eugenio Borao Mateo, José E. Borao Mateo Vassilis Vagios □ Hungdah Su, Hans Werner Hess, Aleksandar Pavković □□, 2012-01-01 Partly due to the European Union's insistent and successful policies on pluriculturalism and plurilinguism there have recently been voices challenging the prevalent and practical consensus in East Asian educational policies that saw English as the only tool for international communication Their argument emphasizes that when dealing with countries that are sellers of goods and services knowledge of the languages and cultures of prospective customers is essential They also acknowledge the strong correlation between economic and political power and the extensive study of foreign languages This book takes a stand on important aspects of this multifaceted argument The first part addresses the meaning of European Studies an issue of great relevance now that Europe in sharp contrast to East Asia is experiencing a severe economic recession The second part presents formulas that have been employed by institutions in East Asia in attempting to satisfy the needs of students and scholars for advanced knowledge of European languages as they strive for answers to their research questions on Europe The final part deals with the difficult issue of linking the syllabuses of European Studies and foreign languages The consensus that emerges from the scholars contributing to this book points towards rejecting the addition of large scale resources for the creation of successful programs in outstanding universities Instead it seems preferable to maximize existing resources by creating conditions that allow ad hoc cross campus cooperation and foster mobility of students through exchange programs so that they can have their own European experience
