Introduction

The Millennium Development Goals embody an emphasis on results, hence the shift of focus from inputs to outcomes. The different programs established by individuals and organizations may seem worthwhile, and sound compelling, but it is impossible to know if they are serving their purpose without collecting data and conducting evaluations. Evaluation is the "systematic investigation of the merit, worth or significance of the effort put in a particular program" (Rubin, 2020). Evaluation offers a detailed conclusion, provides strategic solutions and gives recommendations for the future.

With the four questions asked in evaluation; what happened, why it happened, why the results matter and what is next, evaluators are able to optimally design a project to achieve its goals. Evaluators understand the progress of the initiative and how to maximize its success. At the end, they assess the extent of the project in realizing its goals, in addition to identifying the circumstances resulting in both high and low success levels. Normally, teams within these programs collect data to gauge their progress, which is important, but they only focus on the big picture collaborative-wide instead of the underlying causes of the problems. They also do not offer recommendations (RHithub, 2021). In contrast, evaluation does not overlook the tiniest detail as it seeks to create an opportunity for new adaptations, to maximize success. The process does not only impact the present of a program, but its future initiatives as well. Engaging more participants and incorporating their feedback during the evaluation, has a direct positive impact on communication and logistical support. It can only be successful if the right type of evaluation and stakeholders are involved.

Each of the different types of evaluation serve a different purpose depending on the determined program activities in the logic of the model to be evaluated. For instance, process evaluation determines whether or not the process was appropriately implemented, and how successfully the project followed the strategy, as stipulated in disbursement for the Program from PEPFAR was in 2017 Evaluation of PEPFAR's Contribution 2012-2017 to Rwanda's Human Resources for Health Program describes PEPFAR supported HRH activities in Rwanda in relation to programmatic priorities outputs and outcomes and examines to the extent feasible the impact on HRH and HIV related outcomes. The HRH Program more than tripled the country's physician specialist workforce and produced major increases in the numbers and qualifications of nurses and midwives. Partnerships between U.S. institutions and the University of Rwanda introduced new programs, upgraded curricula and improved the quality of teaching and training for health professionals. Growing the number skills and competencies of health workers contributed to direct and indirect improvements in the quality of HIV care. Based on the successes and challenges of the HRH program, the report recommends that future investments in health professional education be designed within a more comprehensive approach to human resources for health and institutional capacity building which would strengthen the health system to meet both HIV specific and more general health needs. The recommendations offer an aspirational framework to reimagine how partnerships are formed, how investments are made and how the effects of those investments are documented.
