It is the degree to which the individual desires to engage in the behavior that the theory assumes to be the most important determinant of whether there is behavior. The theory assumes that it is not actually or in conscious deliberation that a person decides to engage in a behavior. The theory of habit assumes that the most important factor is the automaticity of the behavior.

Chomsky has said that since employing Chomsky's technique, a student is able to "figure out by his self" or "discover" from the possible lexical choices and finite sequence of grammatical constituents, grammatical structures, and the nature of constituent structure of natural sentences. Chomsky (1965: 13) said that "the main point about describing language is that the bulk of the work of a linguist is to describe language as it is, not as it should be."

15. It is a good empirical indicator (consider the properties of generalized linear models) that, for most distributions, there is a one-to-one correspondence between the mean and the variance. This is not the case for the normal distribution, which has a constant variance. This is why the normal distribution is not a good model for count data.

The statistical approach following Levene, Brown, Brown, Brown, and Brown, 1976, has been used to test the null hypothesis of the absence of a significant difference in the mean number of children for fathers in the two groups. Although this approach has been used in the past, it is not the most powerful.
