

GERIATRIC PSYCHIATRY

Histology and Histopathology of the Aging Brain, edited by Jürg Ulrich. Basel, Karger, 1988, 172 pp., $113.50.

Alzheimer's disease is probably the central neuropsychiatric issue for our generation of physicians. Psychiatrists are becoming increasingly involved in the care of patients with this disease and in research programs aimed at understanding its etiology. Questions of alterations in neuropsychiatric functions that might occur with "normal" aging are also topics of importance for behavioral researchers and clinicians.

Histopathology of the Aging Brain is a state-of-the-art review of histologic controversies in aging and dementia. The book is relatively short and quite densely written. The editor has brought together focused research summaries from an array of prominent neuroscientists in Europe and Canada. The essays are arranged around major themes in neuroscientific research.

The first section reviews the question of regional brain changes in aging and dementia. Dr. Ball of London, Ont., provides a provocative hypothesis that the hippocampal damage in Alzheimer's disease can account for most of the clinical features of the illness and that neocortical changes are incidental. Current research in alterations of subcortical neuronal projections that occur in Alzheimer's disease is also well reviewed in a chapter by Drs. Berger and Gaspar of Paris. These issues are of great importance for psychiatry because of potential links between disturbances in monoamine metabolism and arousal or affective dimensions of dementia.

The second major section of the book includes two essays that describe recent technical advances in quantitative morphologic analysis of neuronal tissue. Pathologists now have available to them optical-electronic instruments that expedite the quantitative analysis of neuronal and vascular structures.

The third major section of the book presents reviews of current research in cytoskeletal abnormalities found in Alzheimer's disease. The last section of the work reviews some recent immunohistologic work in the neuropathology of Alzheimer's disease, along with more controversial topics such as potential aluminum and viral involvement in the disease.

The virtues of this book are that it is current, thoroughly referenced, and well illustrated. Readers should realize, however, that it is essentially a neuroscientific treatise and will be most useful as a reference book. Clinicians and even some clinical investigators in the area of dementia might not need to purchase such a book. The audience for this work is really those scientists who are engaged in dementia research that requires familiarity with the advancing frontier of histopathologic research in Alzheimer's disease.

Geriatric Psychiatry and Psychopharmacology: A Clinical Approach, by Michael A. Jenike, M.D. Chicago, Year Book Medical Publishers, 1989, 381 pp., $54.95.

There are many books on geriatric psychopharmacology that have been sponsored by various pharmaceutical firms. These texts are fine as introductions to the field but really do not go into the crucial problems with enough depth to be useful for the thoughtful clinician. Jenike's work goes beyond the average work and provides a much more solid reference than anything currently available.

The work is reminiscent of my favorite psychopharmacology text, Baldessarini's Chemotherapy in Psychiatry (1). Jenike's work is approximately the same length as Baldessarini's, providing plenty of room for in-depth discussion and references. Another excellent trait common to both books is the generous use of summary tables to highlight key relationships.

Geriatric Psychiatry and Psychopharmacology covers all the major topics relating to geriatric psychiatry from a biological perspective. These include mental status and neuropsychiatric examination of the geriatric patient, metabolic changes with aging that affect drug pharmacokinetics, affective disorders, dementias, psychosis, violence, disruptive behavior, anxiety disorders, sleep disorders, delirium, drug abuse, obsessive-compulsive disorders, neuroimaging, and the interaction of psychosocial factors, psychotherapy, and biological approaches. Thus, the book covers the main areas, and it does so in detail.

Particularly interesting and novel chapters include those on anxiety disorders and obsessive-compulsive disorder. Those of us who have been out of training for more than a few years may not be aware of the explosion of information on these disorders available now in modern psychiatry. These chapters provide much useful information for clinicians who want to get up to speed in these rapidly expanding areas.

All in all, this is a fine work that is particularly timely given that an examination for Added Qualifications in Geriatric Psychiatry is to be part of the American Board of Psychiatry and Neurology examinations.
