Case history

A 79-year-old, physically active gentleman with a medical history of hyperlipidaemia, gout and osteoarthritis presents having had a funny turn during his regular brisk walk, where he has slumped to the floor from standing. An eye witness reports that he was orientated and his speech was normal. However, the patient does not recollect the fall and is admitted for investigations including magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) brain scan, carotid dopplers, 24-hour electrocardiogram (ECG) and electroencephalogram (EEG). A diagnosis of vasovagal syncope is made. He is discharged and remains symptom free.

However, 4 months later he experiences weakness in both legs while out walking and returns home early. While sitting he suddenly becomes drowsy, his left arm and possibly both legs seem weak. His speech is slurred. He remains orientated and gives appropriate answers when questioned. He is re-admitted for assessment and again has no recollection of the event. The episode has lasted for a few minutes. All investigations are normal including a computed tomography (CT) brain scan. However, there is a new finding of raised blood pressure with a reading of 200/105 mmHg. On this occasion a diagnosis of transient ischaemic attack (TIA) is made and he is commenced on aspirin with anti-hypertensives and advised to start anti-lipid therapy, which he declines because of previous statin-induced myopathy.

Over the next 2 months he has increasingly frequent episodes, with left arm and leg weakness and slurred speech. He is diagnosed with crescendo TIAs resulting from untreated hyperlipidaemia and commenced on dual anti-platelet therapy. However, during a subsequent episode an eye witness observes jerking of the left arm prior to the weakness. The episodes increase in frequency until there are daily symptoms. Jerking of the left arm becomes a more consistent feature and with hindsight the patient identifies that in the initial episodes the sensation of weakness in his legs was more of jerking than weakness. Retrospectively it is apparent that after each episode he remains drowsy for some hours and only feels fully recovered after a period of sleep. Extra investigations including MRI brain scan with contrast and extender holder are normal (with only mild ischaemia on MRI). A sleep deprived or video EEG is recommended to capture the electrical activity during an episode but because of logistical difficulties he is unable to attend for this test. After cardiology and neurology review a clinical diagnosis of focal atonic seizures is made. He is started on anti-epileptic medication, and the dose of medication is gradually titrated up. He remains symptom free.

Discussion

Faints, fits and funny turns often present a diagnostic dilemma for physicians and it can take recurring episodes for a definitive diagnosis to be made. Detailed history taking and eye-witness accounts are important for accurate diagnosis, complemented by a thorough examination and appropriate investigation.

This case highlights the diagnostic difficulty. Three different diagnoses were made of vasovagal syncope, TIA and focal atonic seizures. The cause of his seizures remains unclear. It is likely that there was never any episode of syncope or TIA as retrospective enquiry reveals that every episode was accompanied by some limb jerking. This demonstrates the importance of accurate history taking and the use of closed questions for specific symptoms. The episode with accompanying raised blood pressure (BP) can be explained by the known phenomenon of a rise in BP during seizure activity (Devinsky, 2004).

When taking a history from the patient and eye witnesses, key points include the context and the patient's comorbidities, possible trigger factors, the onset and nature of the episode and post-episode events. The wide range of possible differential diagnoses is highlighted in Table 1. Accurate history taking and examination will guide appropriate investigation and ultimately achieve quicker diagnosis. The cardinal clinical features that distinguish syncope, TIA and epilepsy are highlighted in Table 2.
