

Higgins Price Chamberlain Bontecou Westermann

JOHN COPLAND

The "New" in the title of the Pasadena Art Museum's exhibition of the five sculptors—Lee Bontecou, John Chamberlain, Edward Higgins, Kenneth Price and M. C. Westermann—is not intended to either disparage or overthrow an earlier generation of American sculptors, but instead to focus attention on a body of the latest work of a younger and newer generation, one that has developed in the last decade. These sculptors are far more acutely attuned to the Abstract Expressionist painters and owe little or nothing to the older generation of American sculptors. Within sculpture, they hark back to a more distant heritage—that of Brancusi, Arp and Mondri.

What initially distinguishes the work of these younger sculptors is the complete break they make with the whole tradition of sculpture as monument. Perhaps because of the complex physical problems involved in its creation, sculpture is less progressive than painting and has consistently been very much slower in its quality of innovation, but it is curious how long this particular innovation has taken. Brancusi, the most modern of sculptors, worked within the tradition of the monument and to a certain extent it still lingers with David Smith's tank-totems and in Nakian's work. In viewing these works it is quite clear that they are far more at home in an informal environment than the museum. These sculptures are not meant to serve any kind of secular or religious function, to key into architecture or to decorate a setting. As portable as easel painting, they are equally as detached or purely concerned. Each piece is unique, as are paintings. They have the same fragility of surface as a painting, and are not meant to be displayed in the open.

Concurrent with this rupture of sculpture as monument is a sharper emphasis on the optic—a new scale of interplay between the optic and the haptic. In other words, the sense of touch as a principal criterion of sculptural form is overshadowed by an enhanced degree of illusionism. This can be particularized by noting that all five sculptors share a completely revised attitude towards shape (the employment of shell forms), towards formal organization (the adoption of symmetry), towards color (the employment of acute choices) and towards materials (denying the need for truth to materials). Considered together, in every aspect, these five shifts in emphasis reveal a very different sensibility at work.

In exploding shell forms, they do so in a way that often arrives at an equivalent of the looseness, vitality and ambiguity of Abstract Expressionist form. Chamberlain never constructs an enclosed object; his convoluted pieces of automobile skin are giled heavily, the space flowing in, around and under. Bontecou uses a skin suspended on a frame, but her image is fractured into small planes, the deep, dark voids abruptly shattering the compositional locking
