Five-Chambered Heart: Palpitations and Syncope Due to a Left Atrial Appendage Aneurysm

Konrad Teodor Sawicki¹, MD, PhD; Christopher K. Mehta, MD; Robert A. Silverberg, MD

Cardiac magnetic resonance imaging was performed to further anatomically define the left atrial appendage and surrounding structures. The cardiac magnetic resonance imaging confirmed a giant 7.6×6.9×5.9 cm aneurysm arising from the inferior and lateral wall of the left atrium involving the appendage (Figure 2C). No other cardiac structural issues or delayed enhancement was observed. No thrombus was seen within the left atrial appendage aneurysm and apixaban was started for thromboprophylaxis. Coronary artery angiography showed normal coronary arteries without compression from the aneurysm. Given the potential risk of thromboembolic events and the patient's history of atrial tachyarrhythmias with syncope, the patient was referred to cardiac surgery.¹

Intraoperative transesophageal echocardiography confirmed the absence of thrombus within the left atrial appendage aneurysm with normal peak left atrial appendage emptying velocity of 49 cm/s (Figure 3A, Video S3). The patient underwent left atrial appendage aneurysm resection with internal and external primary repair using polypropylene suture via median sternotomy and cardiopulmonary bypass (Figure 3B, Video S4). Mitral valve competency was excellent upon closure of the aneurysm with trivial mitral regurgitation identified on intraoperative transesophageal echocardiography. The patient tolerated the procedure well. There were no postoperative arrhythmias observed on inpatient telemetry, and therapeutic anticoagulation was held. The patient was discharged on postoperative day 3 with metoprolol and a 2-week Holter monitor to assess for any recurrence of paroxysmal supraventricular tachycardia. The final pathology report confirmed the diagnosis of left atrial appendage aneurysm.

At his 1-month follow-up visit, the patient felt well without recurrence of palpitations or syncope. Postoperative 2-week Holter monitor showed no recurrence of the paroxysmal supraventricular tachycardia. At his 3-month follow-up visit, he was exercising regularly without symptoms and was back to working full time.

Left atrial appendage aneurysms are rare.² They can be caused by congenital dysplasia of the atrial pectinate muscles, or secondary to mitral valve disease or conditions that lead to elevated atrial pressure.³ The majority of patients are asymptomatic, while others may present with palpitations, dyspnea, or chest pain. It is commonly detected in the second to fourth decades of
