The Vision Splendid William M. Raine, The broad faces of the sunflowers surveyed with their eternal indiscriminating smile the nape of Horatia's white neck and were no wiser Her back was towards them and they could not see what book was in her lap But the hollyhocks further down the border were probably aware that she was not really reading anything They swayed a little disturbing a blundering bee and Horatia turning her head towards the flower bed glanced for a moment at those tall warriors en f te A gust of perfume suddenly shook out at her from the border Certainly the summer seemed hardly within sight of its end though on this Monday the thirtieth of August 1830 much of the corn was cut already Horatia's own summer was at the full and it was now only old fashioned people who thought the single woman of twenty four in peril of the unblest autumn of perpetual maidenhood For the sake of the red gold bunches of curls at her temples the dazzling skin that goes with such hair the straight wilful little nose the mouth holding in its curves some petulance and much sweetness an admirer might well have been sitting beside her in this agreeable old garden Yet Horatia Grenville was not accounted a beauty She was neither statuesque nor drooping But part of the blame lay undeniably with the book on her lap the Republic of Plato in the original Horatia could and did read Greek without too much difficulty could not or would not occupy her fingers for ever with embroidery or knitting and was believed to despise amateur performance upon the harp In short she was blue and therefore at least in her own county was not beautiful she was learned and could not in

Berkshire be lovely Yes she was twenty four and unmarried a country parson s daughter but well born and well dowered suspected unjustly of knowing Hebrew as well as Greek but always admirably dressed She had never been in love and had never to her knowledge even desired to taste that condition Nor had she discovered in herself any aptitude for flirting She wished sometimes that she did not frighten young men by her real or supposed intellectual attainments but not for any plaudits of the drawing room would she have bartered all that was typified to her by the Greek text on her knee And she had no craving for domestic bliss Indeed she could have had that bliss had she desired it At least two decorous and to her entirely negligible requests had been made for her hand They had come from quite suitable personages whom she had met during her periodical sojourns with her various relations Moreover here at home five years ago the man who had known her from a child and was indeed a distant connection had asked her to marry him That episode had startled and distressed Horatia Tristram Hungerford six years her senior had always been a quasi fraternal part of her life The boy who came over daily on his pony from Compton Parva what time a pony was still to her as an elephant who was construing Livy with her father while her own fingers created the tremulous pothook who climbed the Rectory apple trees while her infant legs bore her but precariously on terra firma whom she welcomed home from Eton with unrestrained joy and offerings of toffee from Oxford as frankly but less exuberantly that this young man should suddenly propose to make her his wife was absurd and she did not like it at all At nineteen Horatia Grenville had been singularly immature for her times She had no wish but that her playmate and friend should retain that role always why should he want to change it She signified as much and to her great relief Tristram reverted with extraordinary completeness to his former part and had filled it for five more years Brookfield and Other Verse
