

Butter, Its Commercial Aspects and a Diagnosis of Its Defects

By P. W. BOUSKA, Beatrice Creamery Co., Chicago

AMERICANS consume one billion six hundred million pounds of butter annually. They eat it at the rate of seventeen to nineteen pounds per capita, which in poundage and cost greatly exceeds any other fat. Butter is the most used spread for bread and the most flavorful fat. Although it has unique dietary value, the majority of consumers do not select it for this reason, but for the reason that they like its taste. For this reason the grading of quality and the price of butter depend more on flavor than on any other factor.

The first requirement is that taste and smell be clean and free from foreign taint. But this is a negative requirement and to rise above this level butter must have a characteristic pleasing taste called flavor and smell called aroma. These are butterlike in character, very difficult to describe, and the only adequate way to gain a conception of them is to taste and smell a good specimen of fine butter.

We hear much of "I like this, but I don't like that." Some persons like one thing and others like another. Is, then, butter quality a personal preference without national and international standards? Indeed no. There is a well recognized national and international standard of quality. Good butter in Chicago is also good butter in New York, London, and Berlin. Poor butter is poor butter everywhere. I do not mean that cities and provinces do not have minor preferences and dislikes. They do have them. But if they really want to buy butter they will accept the better quality from any of the countries that have a reputation for making good butter. Butter is an article of international commerce.

The next point of preference for butter is its plasticity, or convenience in handling and spreading at room temperature. This feature is called body by the butter scooper. It should be compact, free from cavities, free from large drops of water, or oozing water. This defect is called brittleness. For sale in tubs the cut surface of butter should not be dry and tasteless like cheese, but should sparkle with a few small droplets of moisture about the size of pinheads. When tested with a trier it should collapse in a smooth solid plug without raggedness in the plug or adhesion to the back of the trier. This plug, if not too cold, should have some degree of cohesion and elasticity without being brittle or crumbly. The veins of moisture must be clear, not milky.

Practically all the energy and vitamin value of butter is in the fat and the other 20% of non-fatty constituents has little energy. In theory, the pure fat would supply all physiological requirements. But butter fat without water would be like bread without water and air cavities, or apples without water. The art of buttermaking has combined the fat, water, and curd in such manner that it best suits the consumer's esthetic sense.

Color is an essential and distinctive character. Butter is the only edible fat in large volume that has a naturally yellow color. The degree of yellow may vary according to feed or season and according to market or buyer's preference. The color must be uniform and free from mottles or streaks. There should be no specks such as curd or foreign matter.

Butter is made with or without salt as the buyer may desire. Salting must be uniform and free from grit. The percentage is as the buyer wants, usually below 3%, and rarely above. Considerable butter is salted only 1%. The presence of salt accentuates flavors, especially the bad ones. I think it reduces aroma somewhat.

The package should be uniform and clean.

Keeping quality and hygienic quality are not on the commercial score card. Nevertheless, they are very important and it is dependable keeping quality that elevated butter from the class of thirty years ago to the standard article of today sold on the futures market, stored for time of need, or sold on credit at the factory. Pasteurization made dependable by mechanical and bacteriological control produced this keeping quality and hygienic safety. Far in advance of other dairy industries, the creamery pioneered and voluntarily adopted pasteurization. Intelligent control of acidity is the other element of keeping quality. The average acidity of satisfactory butter is 0.02% to 0.05% expressed as lactic acid. At acidities around 0.10% or higher the fat is rancid. At acidities below 0.02% the proteins are unstable and they putrefy rapidly at the neutral point or below.

Although the great majority of consumers choose butter because of its taste appeal, it affords the largest and most palatable supply of vitamin A and contains some vitamin D. It is also the most digestible of all commercial fats.

The manufacture of butter is an art as well as a science. The judging of butter quality is largely an art. Art is therefore very important in diagnosing butter defects. A keen discriminating sense of taste and smell and intuition from familiarity with butter are great helps. The more a chemist is a detective the better he can diagnose causes of butter defects.

Hereunder is a list of butter defects in two groups, one according to taste, and the other according to sight. The approximate relative prevalence of these defects is indicated by order and number, the nearer to the top of the list and the smaller the number, the greater the prevalence.

The first consideration in diagnosing a defective flavor is the character of the taste and smell. These often indicate the cause of the bad flavor, or they indicate what further tests to make. The acid test of butter defects
