and new makers were on the alert. Seven thousand dollars had already been offered for the capture of the fugitives. Later the rewards reached $15,000. All day long planes from National Guard headquarters at Denver flew over the region. No luck.

On the afternoon of May 25, Lieut. Charles L. Reardon of the National Guard, flying over the countryside, spotted a wrecked car lost off a road between Scott City, Kan., and Oakley, Kan. He landed his plane near by and went to examine the car.

The machine was the doctor's. It had been driven over an embankment and its license plates had been removed.

Near by was the doctor's body, still warm. The top of the man's head had been blown off.

Thus had the robbers repaid him for his services. Unthinking, he had gone off on an errand of mercy—and lost his life. Here was ruthlessness worthy of barbarians.

The reader can imagine the effect of this murder upon the inhabitants. The reader can also imagine what would have happened to these savages if citizens had caught them. It is to be doubted if the captors would have restrained themselves long enough and something to throw a rope at.

But still there was no trace of the bandits. And still there was no news of Keadinger, the teller.

Officers examined Dr. Wineinger's car for possible clues, particularly fingerprints. The body of the car yielded nothing; but a single print was found on the right rear window of the machine. A thumb print. It was developed by E. S. Tarverlign, forensic expert of Garden City, Kan., and was later sent to all the prisons in the country, but days and weeks passed fruitlessly. The impression could not be identified.

Next, the discovery of the fourth murder.

It was on June 12. A school-girl, out on a picnic with several other girls, entered an abandoned shack near Liberal, Kan., southeast of Lamar, near the Oklahoma state line, and came upon the body of a man. He had been shot to death about two weeks before.

The body was that of Everett Keadinger.

Police officers and inhabitants of the region couldn't understand how they could have missed finding the body during the exhaustive search that had been made, and it was asserted that the killers must have committed the crime elsewhere and deposited
