

ANATOMY OF A FLAKE

A "flake" is a slice of stone which was broken off of a larger piece of rock. This larger piece of rock is generally then called a "core." The breaking off of flakes from cores is called "percussion flaking." It is done by hitting the core with a type of hammer. These hammers can be another stone, hence "hammerstone," or an another "billet." The flakes taken off in this manner by a person, rather than by a natural event, possess certain anatomical features (markings) listed below. Not all flakes, however, bear all of these features. Which features the flakes do or do not possess tell the archaeologist something about how those flakes were produced. Look at the flake provided to match up the features with the description (it should possess all of the ones listed).

Cortex- the outer skin of the original piece of rock, generally it is of a lighter color than the inside of the rock as well as much less glossy. This skin is created by the effect of the environment (wind, sun, and rain) upon the rock.

Dorsal side- the back of the flake which was originally on the outside of the core, generally there is a ridge down the middle of this side which the force of the striking hit followed to remove the flake from the core. The scars of flakes taken off the core prior to this one should be visible on this side of the flake.

Ventral Side- the "belly" of the flake which was where the flake was removed from the core, it is on the inside of the natural curve of the flake. Most of the key anatomical features of a flake are found on this side of the flake.

Striking Platform- this is where the core was hit to remove the flake, it stays with the flake and generally shows the effect of battering (whitened). This is the top of the flake as well as the thickest end. Sometimes this edge shows cortex.

Bulb of Percussion- this is the bulge on a flake where the force from the percussion exerted its full power. When the core is struck, a cone of force expands out from the striking point- thus creating a bulge on the flake.

Bulbar Scar- this is the scar left by a small flake which broke off the bulb of percussion during the percussion event. The size of the scar is a reflection of the strength of the force exerted upon the core.

Undulations- these are the ripples upon a flake perpendicular to the direction of force (shown by the position of the striking point/ platform) and below the bulb of percussion. The magnitude of these ripples reflect the composition of the material and the strength of the blow delivered.

Striations- these are tiny fracture lines parallel to the direction of force and seen best near the edges of the flake. These fissures (like the undulations) reflect material composition and striking force.
