Deese,2023-07-20 This book assesses the extent to which two specialized UN agencies the International Maritime Organization IMO in London and the International Civil Aviation Organization ICAO in Montreal have been able to regulate environmental pollution in the global commons Since the Kyoto Protocol and its tasking of these two public International Organizations IOs in 1997 to regulate greenhouse gas emissions from the fast growing international shipping and aviation sectors they have struggled with the assignment even as the external pressure has mounted for them to act David Deese examines why these two UN agencies have largely failed to execute their critical missions to date and explores the most promising emerging and feasible routes to control and reduce these emissions by other means Drawing on a range of sources including interviews with key actors in the IMO and ICAO as well as from industry and national governments Deese looks at the multifaceted politics that drive these IOs and considers how this has delayed and frustrated the execution of their assigned climate mitigation missions He also explains how the limitations of the IMO and ICAO are likely to be found to a degree in other UN specialized agencies and examines how lessons learned here will be helpful in understanding the operations of other IOs The book will be of great interest to students and scholars of global governance and IOs transport and environment and climate change It will also be a useful resource for industry and non profit experts and public officials working in shipping and aviation regulation
