Abstract

In the near future, every medical information system will be equipped with a function that provides knowledge-based decision support. Data-driven knowledge-based decision support consists, in the first place, of a medical data-to-concept conversion step and, second, a knowledge base containing medical relationships from medical concepts to decisions. Both, concept and relationship modeling in medicine can be done by using fuzzy sets, fuzzy relationships, and fuzzy decision making algorithms to conserve the inherent fuzziness of medical concepts and medical relationships. Examples of the application of type-n fuzzy sets to model medical concepts and of fuzzy logic, fuzzy decision graphs, fuzzy control, and fuzzy automata in medical diagnosis, interpretative analysis of test results, device control, and data monitoring are given in the present study.

Keywords: Knowledge-Based Methodology, Fuzzy Concepts, Fuzzy Relationships, MedFrame/CADLAG-IV, FuzzyTempToxopert, FuzzyKBWean, FuzzyARDS.

1 Introduction

Patient-specific diagnostic and therapeutic decision support will become a part of every medical information system in the near future [1].

Hospital information systems are being equipped with rule firing mechanisms to automatically generate intelligent alerts, warnings, and recommendations to the attending physician [2-4]. A rule editor with access to medical data dictionaries allows the user to define rules on contraindication alerts, drug interaction warnings, diagnostic and treatment recommendations, etc.

Some laboratory information systems generate the written laboratory report automatically by means of an intelligent reporting system based on medical knowledge stored in a knowledge base [5,6]. These systems may soon become available on Web servers, thus providing worldwide service for medical laboratories [7,8].

Patient data management systems (PDMSs) in intensive care units (ICUs) try to overcome the flood of information by combining and aggregating individual information items to high-level descriptions of patients' findings [9,10]. These high-level descriptions usually constitute the medical terms used by physicians in communication regarding the patient.

Last but not least, stand-alone as well as integrated, frequently very extensive medical consultation systems, are already able to support the differential diagnostic process in areas such as internal medicine: support that is far-reaching and frequently outperforms the diagnostic ability of the individual physician. This becomes obvious in rare medical cases or in cases of multimorbidity [11-14].

2 Knowledge-Based Systems in Medicine

Medicine naturally applies linguistic concepts to model medical knowledge such as disease descriptions, treatment recommendations, prognostic information, and best medical practice management guidelines. Therefore, statements like "Highly increased amylase activity nearly confirms acute pancreatitis" may be found as part of diagnostic knowledge.
