

HOW GALILEO WORKS

Your satnav receiver needs a minimum of four satellites visible in the sky to fix its position on Earth's surface. Each signal incorporates a time stamp. By calculating the time taken for these signals to reach your receiver from orbit, the receiver builds up a 3D position – longitude, latitude and altitude – relative to the satellites in space.

All Galileo satellites transmit at the same frequency bands. To let the receiver distinguish between them, each satellite has its own code embedded in the signal. The receiver compares the received code to local replicas it has stored – this also helps with acquiring what is a very weak signal – equivalent to a torch light shining across a continent. The various Galileo services within the wideband signal are accessed using different receiver codes: the Open Service, High Accuracy Service, Authenticated Service and so on.

The receiver in your smartphone is a single chip, typically smaller than a square centimetre. The satnav signals it receives tell it where the satellites should be in the sky, speeding up its subsequent position fix.
