It is important that the setting, program and interventions be designed to meet students' unique performance characteristics (e.g., physical characteristics, motor skills, cognitive, academic, and organizational skills, etc.). The setting is important in determining the type of program, individualized programs for 1-on-1 and small group activities, group programs.

Participatory management is closely related with, and often is synonymous with, empowerment in providing knowledge, technical assistance, training, and other forms of assistance to policy makers. Participatory management, therefore, implies political participation and consultation. Furthermore, it is an internal, not external, approach and an ongoing one. It is a social process, not a technical one. It is different from empowerment in that it is not necessarily intended to limit the role of the state. For instance, with that intention, the principal role would be to encourage the private sector to take over the state's responsibilities. In fact, participatory management is a process, not a goal. It is a process that is ongoing and continuous.

• It is always essential to give your respondents a good reason to participate in your survey. This can be done by explaining the importance of the research, the benefits to the respondents, and the fact that their participation is voluntary and confidential. You can also offer incentives, such as a small gift or a discount on a product or service, to encourage participation.
