

THE EMPEROR'S NEW UNDERWEAR

BY MEYNARDO A. MACARAIG

"I have been a fool," moaned the emperor to his chamberlain.

"I announced to all the people that I would be wearing a magnificent suit of clothing in today's ceremonial parade and I walked out there in my underwear, thinking I was wearing that magnificent suit and they all saw me as a fool. How could I have been fooled by those charlatans? And in front of all my subjects, too! I am ruined, chamberlain, ruined!"

"There, there," said the chamberlain in comforting tones. "Surely the situation is not that bad. Other emperors have made worse mistakes."

"Don't you understand?" groaned the emperor. "This mistake will destroy me! How can I face the people again when I have been stripped of my imperial dignity? How can I command their respect and allegiance when they have seen me parading myself in my underwear? Only a fool walks around in his underwear. Now, even the lowest of my subjects can sneer at me. At least they don't go around behaving like fools."

The emperor was inconsolable. The incident of the nonexistent clothing had struck him where it hurts, namely, in his image. For years, he had made himself look valorous and brave, steadfast and firm. A statesman of subtle magnificence and quiet strength. Yet, not more than an hour ago he had been walking down the imperial highway, accompanied by a retinue of courtiers, soldiers, attendants, retainers, dignitaries and flunkies - while dressed in purple polka-dot shorts and a monogrammed cotton undershirt. It was a national disgrace. Farmers can lose their crops; businessmen can lose their fortunes and generals can lose their battles but when an emperor loses his clothes, in public no less, then he has truly lost everything. The emperor was seriously contemplating suicide when the chancellor made a most remarkable statement.

"I hardly see what those peasants are so smug about, you highness," commented the chamberlain off-handedly. "Personally speaking, I would consider a man who wore underwear in public to be very brave rather than very foolish. Why, if the emperor himself has no objections to wearing underwear in public, then why should the common man...?"

"That's it!" cried the emperor in jubilation, so loudly and so suddenly that the chamberlain almost jumped out of his underwear.

"If I, the emperor can walk around in my underwear why shouldn't everyone?" No one will dare laugh at me now!"

"I-I-I certainly h-h-hope so," stammered the startled chamberlain. "If-if I may inquire, your highness, j-j-just what are you going to do?"
