Why Humans are Not Chimpanzees

- Not all hominins were subject to the same set of selection pressures (e.g. Paranthropus vs. Australopithecus)
- What were the selection pressures that shaped the genus Homo?
- Ecology (the way an animal makes its living and interacts with its environment) is key to understanding the selection pressures acting on it.
- By the time of Homo our ancestors were exploiting hunted and extracted foods in a savanna environment

Chimpanzees are forest-dwelling frugivores (fruit eaters).

- We believed that chimpanzees have diverged less from that common ancestor
- Closer to that college ancestor than we are
- They are forest dwelling
- Primarily fruit eaters

- Human hunters and gatherers, or human foragers, which are people that have no domesticated plants or animals and live in a pre-agricultural state
- Domestication only began about 10 thousand years ago
- All humans and pre-human ancestors were foragers, relying on plants and animals for nourishment
- Our closest relatives are only minimal extractive foreigners
