

Critical and Clinical Thinking in Nursing Practice

 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

Critical thinking has increasingly become a vital part of nursing practice in the world. Unlike in the past when nurses were required to implement orders issued by doctors, today's nurses have been empowered to make decisions related to their functions as healthcare providers (Benner, Ronda & Molly, 2006). As Benner, Ronda and Molly (2006) observe, nurses should be allowed to make decisions because they spend more time with patients than doctors. However, analysis of the process of critical thinking reveals that it is still not possible for nurses to think critically.

Definition of Critical Thinking

According to American Philosophical Association, critical thinking is the intentional and self-controlled judgment that makes use of one's cognitive abilities (Simmons et al., 2003). Critical thinkers are people who think about how they think (Simmons et al., 2003). While they strive to attain the highest standards, critical thinkers are concerned about the reasonableness of each step they take and are willing to take responsibility for any outcomes (Simmons et al., 2003). Critical thinking, therefore, entails striving to get maximum outcomes while remaining wary of the impediments and possible dangers involved.

In nursing, critical thinking involves the influence of both knowledge and experience (Yang & Jung, 2004). Yang & Jung (2004) asserts that several strategies such as reflective thinking are employed to determine and assess prevailing problems and identify available opportunities to address such problems. A critical thinking nurse synthesizes available information and deploys appropriate interventions within the limits of acceptable nursing practice. Such nurses are normally confident, creative, flexible, inquisitive, intellectual, intuitive, open-minded, patient, and reflective. Yang & Jung (2004) also claims that a critical thinking nurse is able to analyze available information and apply appropriate standards. A nurse should be in a position to look for missing
