Combining these two forms of nationalism is the state's most working and realistic possibility. Many parts of countries secede because they want to preserve their language and culture and defend their rights to freedom of expression concerning their nation. National movements must cease to be perceived as unfavorable because it imposes significant restrictions on preserving culture and traditions. The transition to a solid national idea will likely allow each city/region/country to change in a new direction of changing the consciousness of the people and the recognition of their ethnic identity.

Historical Overview of Quebec

The colonization of New France began with the founding of Quebec by Samuel de Champlain in 1608. Champlain, who was first engaged in fishing in the St. Lawrence River, quickly realized the benefits of the fur trade. To facilitate this trade, he met with a large group of Montagnards at a temporary post at Tadoussac in 1603, where he allied with this group of Algonquins (Basta 68). Quebec became the first major French settlement in America because it had several advantages: there were many furs; the river here was narrow and could be easily controlled; there were plenty of fertile lands (Turgeon et al. 15). The French government did not want to invest in the colony, and it granted the development of the settlement to a trading company, which was given a monopoly on the fur trade and was to settle the territory for its part.

Quebec underwent various colonial structures: French rule lasted until the mid-18th century, when the British crown began to claim the territories. After the conquest, British authorities wanted complete control of the colony and the assimilation of French Catholic settlers (Basta 73). The Royal Declaration of 1763 formalized British rule over Quebec and established the legislative and regulatory conditions for achieving the goals above (Dufour et al. 660). The British soon felt uncomfortable among the French-speaking majority and began to insist that the British authorities reduce the benefits that the 1774 Act granted to the Franco-Canadians (Turgeon et al. 19). After a while, the Franco-Canadians voiced their dissatisfaction with the limited powers granted them by the 1791 Act. The Patriotic Party tabled 92 resolutions in the Lower Canadian Legislature that summarized all the grievances accumulated by the Franco-Canadians since 1791.

In 1840 the British Parliament passed the Act of Union, which united both Canadas and took steps to assimilate Franco-Canadians. Both legislative assemblies were
