The historiography of colonial Spanish America is increasingly dominated by studies devoted to social and economic questions and as a result there are few recently published examples of biography or institutional history. During the last decade, colonial historians have concentrated their research efforts either on social "groups" (the term class seems to be shunned by colonialists as being either too difficult to define or too inflammatory) like merchants, miners, bureaucrats, and slaves, or on the development of basic economic data such as mineral production, grain prices, slave importations, and patterns of land tenure. Interest in these sorts of topics is particularly visible among students of eighteenth-
