✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Clinical ethics considers the quality of life as one of the aspects and analyzes the problem in this area. The quality of life is difficult to discuss and define, as it can vary in different nationalities. Nevertheless, it is necessary to talk about this and highlight comparative indicators, despite the complexity of the topic. Many factors can be considered when evaluating the quality of life, including a person's choices, the values they are guided by, or people's opinions about life and mental/physical health.

The quality of life is influenced and evaluated based on all aspects of people's life. It considers the value of judging a person's life, including all the good and bad that is in it. Based on values, it is possible to characterize the degree of people's satisfaction with goods, including material and spiritual (Jonsen et al. 45). In this case, quality of life measurements can help determine the outcome of clinical interventions. Measures for the adoption of clinical interventions are identified based on factors such as mobility, daily activities of a person, and their physical functions. Scales are used to determine outcomes and the best approaches to clinical interventions. This occurs when the patient experiences pain in the interaction of different medical approaches. Recording data in the scales allows medical providers to evaluate the life indicators and daily life of a person as a whole.

In addition, the quality of life is considered holiness, which is the highest value of a person and must be improved and preserved. This aspect is connected with world religions and their traditional foundations, including the "vitalism" that people encounter when providing clinical interventions (Jonsen et al. 57). According to vitalism, human life must be preserved in all possible ways, and other ways are not considered. When healthcare professionals save a patient's life, it's about the "Sanity of life". However, the concept of life extension under any circumstances is not included in the treatment of the patient and does not give any positive results.

This section will look at some examples of the quality of life and things that have a major focus on clinical care. Every medical worker needs to be aware of how treatment affects the quality of life and what possible consequences it can lead to (Jonsen et al. 71). One of the patients in this section, Mr. Kure, has severe symptoms of meningitis, leading to headaches, general malaise and stiffness of the muscles at the back of the
