Oceanographic exploration is divided into four branches: biological, chemical, geological, and physical. Each of these divisions requires specialized equipment that allows performing research and producing valuable findings. One of the most necessary tools used in biological oceanography is a high-speed digital camera. An example of such a device is the high-speed video camera Hyper Vision HPV-X. This instrument allows making photos and videos of high resolution and observing ultra-high-speed phenomena that were not possible to observe previously ("High-Speed Video Camera Hyper Vision HPV-X"). The camera is produced by Shimadzu, one of the world's chief producers of analytical instrumentation.

The instrument operates similarly to ordinary digital cameras, but features offered by it allow receiving entirely different quality of images and videos. The device records speeds of up to ten million frames per second, its storage capacity is up to 256 frames, and its resolution is up to 100,000 pixels ("High-Speed Video Camera Hyper Vision HPV-X"). The instrument is invaluable in biological oceanography because it enables researchers to capture the life of organisms underwater.

Chemical oceanographers study the temperature and chemical composition of water as well as chemical reactions occurring in the sea and ocean floor. These scientists use a variety of instruments to collect water samples. One such device is the Niskin bottle. This tool is the new generation of water samplers based on the Nansen bottle ("Instrument: Niskin Bottle"). The device has a cylindrical shape and is non-metallic. The instrument has stoppers at both ends.

The Niskin bottle was invented in 1966, and the devices are produced at specialized factories. The tool is submerged in water on a hydro wire. The bottle can be attached individually or deployed in Rosette systems of 12, 24, or 36 bottles. The instrument is highly significant due to giving scientists the possibility to collect samples for such measurements as plankton and pigments.

Physical oceanographers study waves, winds, and tides and their impact on the ocean, as well as seawater motions such as tsunamis and hurricanes. Apart from that, these scientists analyze the ocean-atmosphere relationship that affects climate and

Scientific Information and Documentation Division,1969 Exploration and Science Michael Sean Reidy,Gary Kroll,Erik M. Conway,2006-12-27 This comprehensive volume explores the intricate mutually dependent relationship between science and exploration how each has repeatedly built on the discoveries of the other and in the process opened new frontiers A simple question Which came first advances in navigation or successful voyages of discovery A complicated answer Both and neither For more than four centuries scientists and explorers have worked together sometimes intentionally and sometimes not in an ongoing symbiotic partnership When early explorers brought back exotic flora and fauna from newly discovered lands scientists were able to challenge ancient authorities for the first time As a result scientists not only invented new navigational tools to encourage exploration but also created a new approach to studying nature in which observations were more important than reason and authority The story of the relationship between science and exploration analyzed here for the first time is nothing less than the history of modern science and the expanding human universe
