

Another subject of major importance was Maths. Maths is a subject of vital importance as it marks the beginning of a calculated approach. It involves a child's brain to the maximum and the basic art of calculation is required in every sphere of life. Even for people who do not work, calculations and simple mathematics play a major part in dealing with day to day activities.

The early education given to us about Maths comprised of counting. Counting forms the basis of every kind of calculations. The early education also focuses on minor additions and subtractions. These small calculations not only make a child sharp but also give an intuition which helps develop a brain more calculative and comprehensive. A more calculative brain can judge and interpret things much easier than others.

If we talk about alignment, we cannot compare vertical alignment as we are only concerned with the early education. We also see that the education system was far too aligned horizontally.

The best time to inculcate skills in human brain is when its tender and eager to learn. That is why educating the young brains with early mathematics helps to attain sharp intellect.

The curriculum followed in early education of children is certainly at par with any other age groups. With a solid foundation as such, can a strong build of knowledge be constructed.

Therefore, to sum it up all, it can be said that the early education subjects language arts and maths are very well in accordance with the standard alignments and are in turn helping children grow more and more intellectually and even helps them constantly in academics.
