

Researching the Sources for Writings

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

Researchers using other authors' works in the study either acknowledge them or choose to utilize their own knowledge. For both the writer and the student, a temptation may arise to plagiarize a task given my career areas and studies respectively. So plagiarism is when an author, be it a writer or a student, uses the thoughts and ideas of another author without citing a source. For that reason, I learned that I was plagiarizing when I took credit for a piece of material I did not create. This paper is an entire personal reflection on the research guide as well as a tutorial on how to avoid plagiarism when tackling assignments.

Analysis of Strengths

As a present-day scholarly writer, I have an advantage in a variety of sources at my disposal to refer to when working on a task. I have understood that my writing sources are divided into three categories, namely, primary, secondary, and gray sources. Primary sources are original records on the topic under study, which have withstood the tests of time, such as different regimes, global wars, and extreme weather conditions. They can be published or unpublished and raw depending on their dates and the purpose of their creation. They may include letters, paintings and pictures, artifacts, archeological sites, and articles written by infamous people on historical events that happened during their time.

On the other hand, secondary sources include published and unpublished works of other authors. These authors also utilize information from primary events times after they happened. Published secondary sources include anthologies, monographic books, novels, religious texts, journals, periodicals, and official state and private organizations' publications. Unpublished secondary sources will take the form of filed government and company reports, as well as term reports written by past students who studied in an institution.
