

Dangerous Racial Tension in “Brownies” by ZZ Packer

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

“Brownies” is a short story by ZZ Packer that was published in 2003. The story centers on a group of Girl Scouts in training called “Brownies.” The group is predominantly African-American with only one Caucasian member. Internally, the group follows a mean but authoritative girl named Arnetta. She decides to pick a fight with a different Girl Scout group made up of girls with learning disabilities under the false presence of them using a racial slur. However, the plan goes awry when they confront the girls, with fear and guilt getting the better of Arnetta and her group. This paper will focus on how the point of view and tone of the short story conveys the dangers of racial tension.

Analysis

Although the story is told from the point of view of the girl referred to as “Snot” by the troop, Arnetta could be considered the center point of the short story. She is the one who is behind most of the girls’ actions. At her young age, she already learned how to manipulate both children and adults. She makes sure to pay attention in class to gain favor from her troop leader (Packer 3), and the girls are completely obedient to her (Packer 2). This fact leaves her unopposed and makes her every word that has authority among her group. She also has a jealous and envious attitude toward white people that she uses to instigate the fight. Other girls partially share her point of view but perhaps would not propose a fight if Arnetta was not there (Packer 3). Her point of view could be considered racist, but her age suggests that this is a learned behavior for which her family might be responsible. When confronted with fighting the girls from Troop 909 something changes her mind (Packer 21). Perhaps the act of attacking innocent girls with learning disabilities was too unjust, or her learned behavior became replaced with common sense. Either way, this event changed her mind and the mind of her group. This is significant because it shows how close racial tension can bring people to doing terrible things. The girls blindly follow Arnetta because they all partially believe
