

Discuss how the poets use language and form to evoke feelings of pity in 'Disabled' and 'Out, Out -'

FULL ESSAY – A***

The poem 'Disabled' by Wilfred Owen and 'Out, Out –' by Robert Frost are both written in the 1910s. They share the common themes of tragedy and horror, and link to the problems associated with war. In 'Disabled', Owen talks about a soldier that has returned from a war and describes how the men felt. The poet tries to convey how cruel wars are and how the soldiers would feel after a war. On the other hand, in 'Out, Out –', Robert Frost writes the poem based on a true incident back in 1910. In the poem, Frost is trying to express how warfare can force innocent teenagers to leave their childhood behind and suffer. Both poets have used different language techniques and the way they structure the poems allow the readers to feel pity for the main characters.

In 'Out, Out –', Frost describes the setting of the beautiful scenery and then contrasts this with the terrible incident in a chronological order. He uses words that can be easily-envisaged such as 'Five mountain ranges' and 'Sweet-scented stuff'. The sibilant smell of the dust trivialises the sense of danger given by the saw 'snarl[ing] and rattl[ing]'. The beautiful setting throws the readers off and therefore making the incident more of a shock when it comes. The poet then talks about the 'sunset far into Vermont'. The word 'sunset' foreshadows that the young boy has reached the sunset of his own life and will never rise again. In line 16, the saw 'leap[ed]' out of the boy's hand and 'the hand was gone already'. Frost uses the word 'leap' to personify the saw, which creates an image of the scene for the readers. The accident occurred very suddenly and shockingly. We could tell he is a teenager because Frost describes him as someone 'old enough to know, big boy / Doing a man's work, though a child at heart'. This phrase makes the readers feel pity for the boy because he got his hands chopped off by a saw at such a young age. During the 1910s, farming is an important source of income for people living in rural areas. He himself is 'old enough to know' the impacts and consequences of losing his hand.

Also, the way that Frost builds up tension helps evoking the sense of pity. The use of repetition builds up the perceptions of danger and menace, which allows the readers to feel pity for the boy. He repeated the phrase 'snarled and rattled' to indicate urgency and emphasises how dangerous it is. The use of anthropomorphic language makes the readers think the saw is as
