

REBELLION AND SEDITION

In the Revised Penal Code, Rebellion and Sedition is a crime against public order. These terms are used in political discussion to categorize the act of resistance from the government. The definition of Rebellion and Sedition often makes them to be considered as a form of treason. due to its similarity. However, Rebellion and Sedition are also different in legal and conceptual basis. Additionally, Rebellion and Sedition are two different offenses when it comes to their actions.

When it comes to intention, Rebellion and Sedition is aiming to overthrow the current government and replace it, but in a different process of action. Rebellion is inclined to be in violence, by using dangerous paraphernalia like guns and knives that will harm any innocent individual. On the other hand, Sedition is the non-violent action against the state. This is the act of promoting hate to the government through persuading the citizens. The persuasion may come in variations, it may be through literature, public speaking, banners or any type of representation.

On the 1st of February 2021, a coup d'état emerged in Burma, Myanmar. Military took over the authority from the government who won on a general election happened in November 2020. Military believed that the votes between their partylist and the National League for Democracy Partylist was fraudulent, after the latter received 396 votes out of 476 while the military partylist gained 33 votes. Although the military's motivation for the coup d'état was not made apparent, this incident is thought to be the cause of the uprising against the Myanmar government.

In 2019. Along with the other 35 people involved, the former vice president Leni Robredo was accused with sedition and inciting sedition. The dispute was allegedly a defamation of the then-President, Former President Rodrigo Roa Duterte, with the intention of elevating Vice President Leni Robredo to the position of leadership within the government. However, these charges were dropped after the vice president presented evidence of her innocence.

To sum up, although being frequently confused, sedition and rebellion are two separate things. Sedition is an activity that challenges power without resorting to violence. It differs from rebellion in that sedition involves encouraging the populace to oppose the government by public statements, whereas rebellion openly involves violently overthrowing the government. Both have the same ultimate objective, but their methods of implementation are different.
