

Change over Time Essay: United States Foreign Policy

Topic: Politics & Government | Words: 588 Pages: 2

This essay will focus on the key changes in US foreign policy from the 1890s to the 1950s. In general, during this period, the US experienced drastic economic and technological development, making it the undisputed hegemonic power in the international arena. Due to its geographical location, the US was not destroyed by the two World Wars happening in Europe, so it had the opportunity to increase its production. However, it is interesting to analyze the case of American foreign policy because the presidential office was held by the Republican and Democratic parties during different periods. In the 60 years, the US faced the great threat of Soviet communism, which forced it to become more economically open to allies and to become as involved in international politics as possible.

The key economic transition in foreign policy was the change of attitude toward openness to external goods. Initially, many presidential terms were occupied by Republicans who advocated for high protective tariffs.¹ Warren G. Harding, in his address to the Home Market Club of Boston in 1920, proclaimed the principle of "not submergence in internationality, but sustainment in triumphant nationality".² Later, in 1930, Hoover signed the Smoot-Hawley Tariff of 1930, the highest trade tariff in American history.³ However, the radical economic decline showed that ignorance of goods from global markets is a bad strategy. Therefore, Franklin Roosevelt's administration significantly reduced trade tariffs and eliminated the policy of destructive protectionism.⁴ Such a transition shows how the US has become more open to the external world during this period.
