

Miles Davis contribution to African American music

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

The history of African American music is long and rich in content. This is why the question about who qualifies as the greatest African American musician of all time always elicits big debates. When it comes to the greatest African American musician of all time, more than a dozen names come up. There are those who came earlier like Duke Ellington, Louis Armstrong, and Charlie Parker.

Then there are later participants like Al Green, Jimi Hendrix, and Marvin Gaye. Both lists feature personalities of great talent. Most of these musicians qualify for the title of the greatest musician.

However, when it comes to modern music, I believe Jazz musician Miles Davis deserves this title. Miles, a Jazz trumpeter has his origins in Missouri. This paper will trace Miles' roots, his career, his contribution to African American music, and his influences.

Unlike most African Americans of his time, Miles was brought up in a wealthy household. He was born in 1926 in Alton Illinois. His father Henry Davis was a successful dentist. His family owned a big town house as well as a 100-acre ranch. In his younger days, Miles frequented the ranch where he loved to ride horses. When he was young, Davis' mother wanted her son to learn how to play the piano.

However, when he was about thirteen years old, his father gave him a trumpet. After noting the young boy's interest in the instrument, Miles' father decided to hire a tutor for his son. Therefore, St. Louis' musician Elwood Buchanan became Miles' first trumpet teacher. Buchanan was the one who taught Miles how to play the trumpet without vibrato. Miles used this style throughout his career.

Miles Davis was once quoted commenting on the role music played in his life. He said that music was "like a curse" to him because it dominated his every thought. However, as a young boy Miles dreamt of being a baseball player. This all changed when his father gave him his first trumpet.
