

and understanding of lexico-grammar and enhanced skills of discovery learning (Liu and Jiang, 2009).

For many researchers, the speech event still represents a level of analysis that has the advantage of preserving information about the social system as a whole while at the same time allowing the researcher to get into details of the personal acts" (Durant, 1998:219). The basic unit for analysis of verbal interaction is the speech event, because it focuses upon the interaction between the speakers (Gumperz 1986: 16-17). The conversational unit being analyzed in this report is a single event because it maintains the same number of speakers throughout and deals with the same topic, i.e., the research on learner activity (Saville-Troike 1989: 27). The basic assumption underlying the speech event would be that it also imparts an understanding of the social activities and context within which this interaction occurs, with participants coordinating their activities around some common task (Durant, 1998:215). In this instance, the participants are discussing the research being carried out on their learning of English and the related activities.

An analysis of the underlying lexicogrammatical signatures within linguistic corpora (Gilquin et al. 2007: 322) is facilitated through error tagging systems. One example of an error tagging system that is devised by Nicholas (2003; cited in Granger, 2007:256) is a three tier system specifying the error domain (the form, grammar, lexis, etc), the category of the error (for instance, whether tense, gender or number) and the word category (adjective, noun, verb, etc), which offers tremendous potential in teaching of English as a foreign language. (Meunier, 2007).

One of the findings that has emerged from learner corpora is that some linguistic features are common to learners from all foreign language groups,
