

CHAPTER 15

EVOLUTION OF NIGERIA AS A POLITICAL UNIT

Epelle Alafuro

Introduction

It may be necessary to start this chapter by emphasizing that the Nigerian State as we know it today with its distinct geo-political identity is a product of British colonial imperialism of the mid nineteenth century. This must not however be taken literally to mean that the different ethnic groups that were forced to coalesce into what we have today as Nigeria had no pattern of socio-political arrangement that met their needs, because however elementary those arrangements had seemed in the eyes of a cursory observer they exhibited all the characteristics of any other organized political society of the time (Nwabueze 1982:2). This clarification has become necessary due to the obviously jaundiced knowledge peddled by some European scholars that black people, prior to colonial rule, had no history or principles of conduct. For instance, while Professor Hugh Trevor-Roper had been quoted as saying that, "perhaps in the future there will be some African history to teach. But at present there is none..." (quoted in Crowder, 1968:10), others more "benign" than him concede that though there may have been some periods of significant studies in African history, yet such leaps in history are the effort of the Hermits, a branch of the white race who they hypothesize had visited the African continent in an earlier period. This wry logic summarized under the Hamitic hypothesis did not believe that the great kingdoms, empires, civilizations and distinct administrative paraphernalia found in the continent at the threshold of colonial imperialism were endogenously evolved. To Seligman and his European disciples who espouse this Hamitic view, pre-colonial Africans were not capable of any rational thought of their own (Osagie 2002:1-2).

Consequently, in this section we will attempt to prove that Africans, Nigerian inclusive, had a glorious past just like the Europeans and the Americans, thus confirming the argument by Afrophiles that the underdevelopment which Africa faces today was not only because she was technological inferior to the former as at the onset of colonialism in the nineteenth century (Crowder 1968:4-5), but also because of the debilitating trans-Atlantic slave trade. According to Osagie (2002:2), this inhuman trade which lasted for more than three centuries greatly destabilized the African continent as able bodied men and women who were contributing to the well-being of their different nations were carted away to the Americas (Epelle, 2010:3).

Though Nigeria prior to colonial rule has been recorded as having about 250 ethnic groups (Nwabueze 1982:9-10; Epelle, 2010:15) each with its distinct cultural identity, yet scholars have argued that beneath this seeming cultural diversity lies some common attributes especially in the area of political administration where two main types have been distinguished, the centralized and the non-centralized political systems (Igwe 2003:20).
