of developing PTSD and depression symptoms following a traumatic event A 2x3 MANOVA was utilized to examine the two hypotheses stated above as well as an interaction between gender protected immigration status and overall mental health distress Protective immigration status was shown to be indicative of overall better mental health outcomes as refugees and asylees reported lower incidence rates of PTSD and depression The role of gender was shown to have no significance in overall mental health distress as men and women both displayed similar levels of PTSD and depression symptomatology Further research is needed to examine any spurious variables such as level of social support This study provides valuable insight into the plight of survivors of torture and may direct clinical services to at risk populations
